CALL FOR PAPERS

COLLECTING

IMPRESSIONISM

JUNE, 25-26
2020

ROUEN
DU PANORAMA XXL
The meaning of the term «collection» is clarified during the nineteenth century. Strictly speaking, it refers to anyone owning, buying accumulating objects: in short, collecting them. This concrete description covers the variety of profiles and of ways of collecting that arose during this period, and has the benefit of being free from the connotations attached to the formerly used terms of «amateur» or «connoisseur», which are strongly associated with the notions of taste, erudition, artistic or intellectual commitment. Although they are not above economic and social concerns, collectors of Impressionism have often been involved in this movement: depending on when they started their collection, they contributed to its emergence, helped strengthen its place in the art world, or promoted it on an international level. This specific category of enthusiastically involved collectors, who, without necessarily ignoring other artistic interests, played a part in the history of Impressionism, is to be the focus of this symposium.

Although a considerable amount of research has been devoted to a few key figures among art collectors, the main challenge of this symposium will be to go beyond the monographic approach and to favor a more comprehensive one, based on transversal analyses, comparative studies, and in-depth problematization. The subject of collectors and their collections will be addressed in connection with their time and its political, social and economic context. The objective is to clarify the role played by collectors in the development and popularization of Impressionism from the beginning of the movement until the middle of the 20th century. Far from being isolated, collectors belong to a network of both private and institutional actors, whose connections to one another, and their place in the modern art world’s wider network, will have to be uncovered. Whether one chooses to approach this topic by focusing on the object, on the collection or on the collector, this contextualization also means taking into account the territorial component. The different scales, from the regional to the international will be compared, and comparative challenging and cross analyzes favored.

In order to expand on this, several avenues of research are available.

SHAPING THE COLLECTION

How is the passion for Impressionism born in the collection? Collectors build their collection either from an inherited core, or around a particular idea, or even by simply allowing themselves to be guided by happenstance and chance encounters. The collection then comes into the objects’ life, thereby altering its course. At a time of generalized collecting, the decision of some collectors to favor Impressionism raises the question of their motivations. Do these motivations have to do with the collectors’ socio-economic profiles? Their personal history? Their gender? And what about where they live? Does the way one collects art depend on whether one comes from Normandy, Paris, America or Russia; do collectors apprehend the act of collecting the same way if they have met impressionist painters and if they were born after these artists have passed away? Beyond aesthetics, the collector’s selection is sometimes influenced more subtly, by types of objects, format, subject, or even by a specific artist.

1. LabEx is short for LABoratoire d’Excellence, or in English: excellence laboratory. It’s an interdisciplinary cluster of research teams. Ours is called Les passés dans le présent, meaning Pasts in the present.

How a collection is assembled also raises very practical questions, such as the amount of money spent, the way the art was acquired – at an auction, directly from the artist, or through an art dealer – which intermediaries were involved, what literature was read to help with the art selection… Some only surround themselves with works that are easy to obtain, when others are ready to travel to expand their collection.

WORKING ON AND SHOWCASING THE COLLECTION

What characterizes a collection is that it’s never completed. Its life, made of purchases, resales, exchanges and gifts, is often very intense and mobilizes an entire network of artists, art dealers, experts and friends (collectors or not). It also requires the capacity for very concrete material management having to do with the storage, conservation and/or restoration of the artwork. More obvious, but often with no clear answer, is the question of the visibility of the collection. Can one easily see it? And if so, in what kind of place, under what conditions and for which public is it displayed? This topic – the display and showing of a collection – leads to two other subjects that exert a persuading influence at the time of Impressionism: interior design and artwork installation. Publications meant to help collectors in their endeavors also appear during this period.

Simultaneously, parallel to the development of collection-oriented practices, scientific knowledge in the field increases and deepens significantly. Written by collectors themselves or by intermediaries – critics, art dealers, historians – many publications around and about collections are released in an effort to organize and structure the information they have as well as to inventory the artwork. This evolution echoes specialization in art history, as the appearance of the first catalogues raisonnés illustrates. This early scientific research sometimes brings indirectly to light new aspects of collections, they for example point out the many forgeries that were circulating at the time. This ambition to document and popularize collections was made achievable through the advancement of photography and the reproducibility of works of art.

STUDYING IMPRESSIONISM THROUGH ITS COLLECTIONS

Mediation efforts and increasing visibility of collections emphasize the role said collections played in the diffusion of the movement during the artists’ life or even during the first half of the 20th century, in different territories. How did these collections influence the way Impressionism was perceived? What impact have they had on the public’s taste and on artistic practice, from local to global, and especially in Japan and the United States? On the international scale, at a time when nationalism rages, the expansion of Impressionism, originally considered a French movement, was often slowed as it competed with the will to support and develop a national art.

It will therefore be useful, whenever possible, to study the collector’s position. Does he deliberately choose to support the movement, to defend it almost militantly? During this process, does he put himself in the spotlight or does he let his collection take center stage? And what means does he use for this endeavor?

FUTURE OF THE COLLECTIONS

Whether a collection finds itself sold, donated, lost or looted, whether it retains its integrity or is scattered, it is almost always confronted with its disappearance. This often occurs after its owner’s passing, but it can also happen during his lifetime. Some collectors see in the art they own a true purpose, and this often sheds new light on their motivations and on their conception of the collection. The collecting frenzy ran parallel to the museum boom; and as museums offered collections a rather obvious destination, they facilitated the development of collections. Studying the relations between private collections and public institutions as well as between collectors, curators and associations of friends of museums will therefore surely prove profitable.

While some, work to shape their collection as a meaningful whole able to stand on its own, and regard donating it as a way to preserve its integrity; others, on the contrary, focus more on the value of each separate piece and prefer to see their collection featured in auctions. If the trajectory of the collection ends at that point, that of each object goes on, sometimes allowing us to retrace the circulation of works and therefore to contribute to its valorization. Other times, collections are dispersed more violently, as is the case with lost or looted collections. If tracking these is more difficult, it proves especially fascinating as they are often less well-known.

These research suggestions are neither comprehensive nor exclusive and the scientific committee, though it will be particularly attentive to problematization efforts, as well as interdisciplinary contributions and transnational perspectives will examine every proposal with a keen interest. The objective is not so much to sketch a portrait of the collector persona (unless it allows us to uncover an unknown or little-known personality), it is to question the contribution of the collectionism to the impressionism, by presentations accessible to the public, as well as to the specialists. These papers will be published in a book.

In connection with the conference, a website will be launched. A research workshop Collectionism: approaches, tools and methods will be held on October 3, 2019 in the seminar room 2 of the Max Weber building at Paris Nanterre University.

Research grants will be awarded (see details in the attached document).

Proposals will be no more than 1 page long and will be accompanied by a short bio-bibliography. They are to be sent before October 31, 2019 at: collectionner.limpressionnisme@gmail.com
